And the following choice morsel, which serves to illustrate the quality of the Congressman's wit:

"Said the big red rooster
To the little speckled hen,
'You're in a fix. Around here is a sin.'

'Said the little speckled hen
To the big red rooster,
'I'll crow around here. Whenever I choose.'

Congressman Heflin comes from the South—from the extreme South, indeed, where women are supposed to be soft-soled and too fragile for everyday wear; but it is significant that he is a man from the North where the law discriminates more harshly against women than in any other part of the country. Perhaps the fact that in a number of the Southern States a married woman is a mere chattel, and under her wedding day all that she owns or earns forthwith becomes the property of her husband, cordially accords with Congressman Heflin's idea of the function of the "big red rooster" to ward the "little speckled hen.

One of the groundings for his objection given by Heflin was that the street cars would have to stop running on the day which his "constituents" may ride for 5 cents. Apparently, when the cars stop, they have to pay how many dollars for a car to travel 5 cents or more? This question is left open to the moral tone of the people's representatives.
