"Glorious News!": How Maryland newspapers reported the War of 1812

When the nation was engulfed in its second war with Great Britain within thirty-years, newspapers informed the public on the major events of the day just as they do in the twenty-first century. Newspapers also reflected the sentiments and concerns held by their readers held at the time. Whether the editor enthusiastically praised a recent victory on the open seas, or lambasted the leadership for a poorly executed military operation on the frontier, newspapers were keenly aware of their audience and utilized every opportunity to gain a foothold in the public arena.

Maryland was in a unique position during the War of 1812; the Executive and Legislature were heavily Federalist, and against the war with Great Britain, while a large portion of the citizens of Maryland sided with James Madison and the Republican Party, believing that the war was just and would solidify the independence of the United States against her colonial ruler once and for all. You can see these opposing viewpoints clearly in the publications at the time.

During the years surrounding the War of 1812, newspapers wrote editorials in response to articles published in rival newspapers, sometimes engaging in a heated public dialogue for months. At the same time, newspapers relied heavily upon other publications outside of the region for national and international news, regularly publishing articles from other papers. One thing is for certain: newspapers during the 19th century were very popular, quite influential, and heavily depended upon for information on wartime developments.

For Marylanders, it was especially important for newspapers to provide details on the enemy's movements after 1813, when the British were active in the rivers and creeks of the Chesapeake Bay. Due to the slow pace of news gathering, information would constantly stream in from outside the region about events that at times had occurred months in the past.

This document packet looks at a number of Maryland newspapers that were active during the War of 1812, and provides a number of articles on important events from Maryland and abroad. They are arranged chronologically so that the reader can compare how the different news sources reported on similar events, clearly illustrating the various political viewpoints that existed in the state during this time.
